The chief executive Scott van Iperen explains that when he first started the Omnia diamonds group back in 1999, a focus on workplace culture was nowhere to be found and for first five years, we had no real idea of what culture was.

At the time we were running a business with about 20 people, all doing our very best, but really we didn't know what we were doing, or where we were headed and began to wonder if business management was for him, "he decided to find a solution."

We developed an "passion" with culture, as he transforming Omnia Diamonds from a "unorganised" team to a team with a clear set of core purpose and values.

Sticking to those values over time has led the business to considerable success, and all business actions and communications are driven around these values. Van Iperen believes it's never too late for businesses to adopt the culture, the core is to focus on people and focus on business performance.

"When hard times come, you find yourself focusing too much on the numbers and not enough on the people and culture, so it's about finding that equilibrium.

"We keep moving forward, creating new and exciting designs, and doing new things, using new tools like CAD because our team is curious and curiosity keeps leading us to new adventures."
